can have a very significant impact on your portfolio. The big issue I see with this is that it is not standard at all. That means that it will eventually be a pain in the ass to find anything since you will have to keep the value of the object in your head while in a database that has no mention of it. Another issue with this is that objects are both owned by the user and can be in the collection of something else. Which ever you have your value stored in does not have to be indexed but a search could be for a specific value. Objecthood and its relationship to foreign keys My opinion is that Entity Framework, specifically theObjectContext is a horrible place for managing data. I come from a mainly embedded background and find entity frameworks and the like very annoying to get at. You need to make a bit of a thought for getting the data out of the app and the database into the domain model and then use an ORM. This will bring out one of the most annoying aspects of ObjectContexts, the lack of the IDisposable pattern. Which means that when you use the context to work with data its not disposable. This means that if you want to persist it you will have to work with some aspect of the context object. You will also have to create objects using it to persist them. Which means that you will be squirreling it away. Finally to get at the data you need to use a DbContext. They are a pretty good thing but there are issues with them. Not the least of which is that because they are run by the database, they are usually going to be queried through the database rather than data exposed in the model directly. The reality is the data itself is usually going to be kept in the database. What you really want is to change the model so that you can have the database query the model directly instead of being forced to traverse it twice. The second point is probably the most important and that is that everything in the database needs to be exposed through the domain object model. If you do not have a way to show the ID of an object, or what the relationship is to another object, then you are going to have a big challenge. From the other perspective this is a very bad thing. How can you deal with an N-T relationship? How can you deal with all the stuff that goes along with them? The reason I
