User interfaces While there have been hundreds of different user interfaces created over the years by various companies, all of them have a similar interface. At the top of the screen is the main drawing window where there is a typically framed title bar containing the date and time, a simple document window icon (a white AutoCAD logo with a blue rectangle on the left in AutoCAD 2011 and 2012), and a dashed red line that shows the path for the current command and the cursor. Below the drawing window is a gray horizontal strip that separates the content of the drawing window from the status bar and contains a variety of controls and toolbars including a menu bar (File, Edit, etc.) and the menu bar. The left side of the drawing window is reserved for toolbars and controls, including the ribbon bar which houses most of the major toolbars and an AutoCAD logo. The status bar at the top of the screen contains information such as the date, time, a flag indicating if a system is offline and an AutoCAD logo. The status bar also contains a dotted red line that indicates the path for the current command and the cursor, and contains information about which commands are active. The right side of the screen, below the drawing window, also contains toolbars and controls. The most important of these is the status bar, which contains icons such as the mouse pointer, the line drawing cursor, the arrow cursor and a paper clip. A quick status bar is also available and will display the status of an active command. The ribbon bar contains the buttons and menu items to control the drawing window. Determination of the pathogenicity of epidemic keratoconjunctivitis. Epidemic keratoconjunctivitis (EKC) is a common manifestation of a variety of viral infections. Its clinical presentation and immune response may be indistinguishable from that of acute herpes simplex keratitis. A prospective, randomized clinical trial was carried out to distinguish the immunopathogenesis of EKC from acute herpes simplex keratitis. Seventeen patients, 16 to 25 years old, were treated with topical cidofovir 1% and 1% probucol ophthalmic suspensions. Immunological monitoring was performed by the measurement of serum interferon (IFN)-alpha, -beta, and -gamma and nasal secretory IFN-alpha by radioimmunoassay. In addition, all patients were tested for the presence of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection. Standard clinical evaluation included slit-lamp examination and clinical scoring of corneal inflammation. All patients were confirmed as having acute herpes simplex keratitis. Patients were tested for HIV, and none of them were positive. The mean duration of EKC was 13.4 days. The median epithelial and stromal scores at the onset of therapy were 2 (range, 1 to 3) and 2.5 (range, 1
