About Us.Q: Memory management with pandas dataframes in python I have a list which consists of data of different length. But there is a rule that elements should not have length more than 2500. So I am using following code to process data.

def func(object_list): df_temp = pd.DataFrame(object_list) df_temp.rename(columns={"0_" : "year", "1_" : "city"}) df_temp.rename(columns={"0_0" : "fed"}) df_temp.drop(columns=['0_0']) df_temp.drop(columns=['1_0']) df_temp.drop(columns=['2_0']) return df_temp

My question is how to use the memory efficiently in such a case. Because I have a lot of data.

A: You can read the data from a dictionary directly. You have to create the dictionary with keys appropriate to the structure of your data. Here is an example. For your data there are two columns - id and title. For your dataframe you should define the index as id, and use `pd.Series.from_dict` to convert the key/value structure in the dictionary to data.

```
import pandas as pd import numpy as np d = {'id': [1, 2, 3], 'title': ['hi', 'how are you', 'bye']} df = pd.DataFrame(d)
```

You can retrieve the dataframe using keys with python's dictionary behaviour

```
print(df.loc['hi'])
```

id	title
0	hi
1	how are you
2	bye

Using this method all the columns will be named, and you can select them using a column name.

```
print(df['title'])
```

id	title
0	hi
1	how are you
2	bye

If you want to rename all the columns and rename them properly, then you can use the following command `df.columns = ['id', 'title']` You can then select columns using the column name. `print`
