We will be looking at the number of mile-posts that will be required if the size and weight is increased or decreased. That may also change what road types are most affected. The freight railroads, they are not very concerned with this issue. These studies are really meant for the highway department. They really want to know the estimates for the number of repairs needed in terms of pavement and bridges because that is the most important thing for the highway department. Thomas Kearney: I understand that. Just be careful to differentiate between what we've been doing for all the different companies, and then the Federal Rail Administration didn't like and took exception to, and that was related to railroad crossings. We are not addressing that aspect of the infrastructure and that is very well understood. We will only change our parameters once we've done what we have to do for the Federal Rail Administration. So the benefit that we are going to be able to look at that was also highlighted in Max's talk is if one of the properties that a railroad owner has is that they can generate their own energy. We are also going to be looking at that and determine the potential impact that might have on the grid. They may also have locations where they are able to generate their own energy that would help supplement the grid so these are the types of things that we will be looking at in this study. As Max also mentioned just be aware that this is not the complete look at everything. There will be other components that will be included. This is the main component of our study which is about intermodal railroad and this is what we focused on yesterday.
