some people have really weird double standards about their understanding of what constitutes news. if its a story about what's happening in the world right now, its like a movie, its a thing that has occurred or is occurring. if its about a thing that happened earlier, but no one takes it as news, then its not news anymore. thats why when there's a major event like 9/11, and no one says 'i did that', it can be difficult to process the idea that people wouldnt say 'i did it' if it were not as true as it is. thats why it was so important that the people who did it got caught, because otherwise it would have been easy for people to build up a false belief that they are just like the people who did that. likewise, if someone says something to you that you wouldnt find problematic as an adult, and then there's some kind of change that makes you think that the adults in charge are actually okay with it, its much easier to believe the change you are imagining. i find it interesting that it seems like something drastic would be necessary for people to stop being so uninterested in the news. like, its not like on most days, you can check facebook, go to your phone, or whatever and not know that anything in the world is going on, you just see that your friends seem to think theres stuff going on. it just seems like theres so much more going on than i can be aware of. but, people can, and do, gain a full awareness of what's going on in the world. its just not being talked about in ways that people would recognize as news. i also am not sure what you mean about the notion that gay marriage isnt about same-sex relationships, or it would be some kind of great equality under the law to allow one type of relationship while denying it to another. this is the relationship which marriage is
